

The lovebirds are together again!

Jen's fiancé Warren arrived from South Africa this morning for a two-month visit — we were all delighted to see him again, but none more so than Jen!

He'll be house-sitting and boarding with friends in and near Thame during this period, and has brought work with him as part of his assignment with OMS (formerly Overseas Mission Society). But he and Jen will have plenty of time to be together, and to discuss future plans. They may even have decided on a wedding date by the time he leaves at the end of July!

Last week Jen finished her third year Anthropology course at Goldsmiths College, University of London. For several years she has been planning towards a career in conflict resolution.

We'd value your prayers that the Lord will bless Warren's time over here, and especially that He will lead him and Jen as they think about how their different lives and (prospective) careers can be combined. They have some difficult decisions to make. But we believe God has brought them together, and that He will set before them an open door into the life He has prepared for them.
